

INVESTIGATION #5 FOR:
JPG Magazine

An investigation into showing the “back stories” behind the photos, without making it too “brochure-like”. What makes it designerly? How do I turn it around and make the design more interesting? How do I make everything not “just right”. How do you say something that does not say “headline”?

First I began to work with the type only to tell the stories of the individual photos (all content pulled from online). Then I layered in the photo and looked at how that changed the story and composition. Working with the orientation of the photos I found it added interest to the meaning. The vertical photos are intended to involve the viewer in rotating the piece, making the type drop away and give them a “new way of looking” at the photo and the story.

My mom and dad are both in bed.
One wearing shoes, one barefoot.
One on back, one on stomach,
lying different directions.
Our dog in the middle.
Family portraits hang on the wall above a rocking chair that nobody uses.
